Brand New Book. Excerpt from The Psychology of Reading: An Experimental Study of the Reading Pauses and Movements of the Eye These interesting observations were further extended and first given significance by the extensive investigations of Erdmann and Dodge.² By a similar method of direct observation, the movements of the reader's eye were recorded from the reflection in a mirror. It was found that an average of five fixation pauses per line was made by one subject (d) in reading a page from Locke's Essay, (width of line cm.) and an average of eight pauses per line was made by E in reading from Helmholtz's Physiol. Optik, (width of line cm.) The variations from this average were small. The main conclusions from their varied experiments are the following: A larger number of pauses are made in difficult than in comparatively simple narration, and the simpler the text the more nearly equal are the pauses and movements. Similarly a longer time and more pauses are necessary to read a foreign language than to read one's own language. The same is true when the attention is directed to the text, as in proof-reading. The average angle of movement between two successive pauses varied from 35° to 50° for difficult or unfamiliar passages of the above cited books, and from 45° to 55° for familiar passages. That is, in either case the eye does not reach to the very edge of the line, but the first and last fixations fall within the line. The first fixation comes nearer to the beginning of the line than the...
