The waters sent over the Earth, by the melting away of the icebergs, contained in sediment much matter, which was deposited, together with other matter, accumulated in its ragings from mountains, c, upon the Earth, which deposits are now called the diluvial formation. The raging of the waters was terrible. Mountains, that towered towards the heavens in princely grandeur, were reduced to little hills. Hills were converted into mountains. Seas changed their beds, rivers sought new channels, and a wide change was effected in the face of the universe. It must be remembered that the whole Earth was not inundated, but the eastern continent was chiefly the seat of this convulsion of waters. By the melting away of these stupendous icebergs the equilibrium between the internal and external forces was again destroyed. Volcanoes sent forth their...
